Tragedy at the Dargans' Place

1 When they were back on the small boat, and Grandma in her chair again, Dewey poled the boat around the mud-bank into the mainstream of the river.

2 " Steady, boy," Grandma said.

3 "Yes, Grandma."

4 After a moment, he was aware that Grandma had no further instructions for him and he looked and noticed that she had fallen asleep.

5 Silently, they drifted down the river. They passed a long treeless bank. Dewey could see the golden stretch of grass beyond and the streaks of red flowering plants that laced it.

6 Then, he began to think of the Dargans. He had just passed the high clay slope he had noticed often from the trail, and the Dargan cabin was not more than an hour or two journey's walk away. He must stay awake and alert. It would not do to pass it by. He moved the raft closer to the left bank so that stopping would not be a problem.

7 The Dargan family had been there on the grassland longer than any other family, and Mr Dargan, a tall, strong man with a beard that reached his belt buckle, would take them in as warmly as if they were his own kin. In his mind, Dewey could hear Mr Dargan's voice, welcoming but concerned, saying, " Come in, come in Margaret. Get Mrs Martin and Dewey something hot to drink." Drawing aside, he would say, "All right, Dewey lad, tell me what the trouble is." What a relief it would be to tell of their trouble and place the responsibility on broader shoulders.

8 He watched the left side of the river eagerly, for he was afraid that the cabin would not be visible from the river. It was set back in the shelter of another smaller slope: Chimney Bluff, it was called, because of the high stack of rocks on the top. It was that pile of rocks that Dewey was looking out for.

9 He thought of the good, hot supper Mrs Dargan would prepare for them. The cold lunch he had had felt like a hard knot in his stomach and he thought of the soft, sweet-smelling grass mattress in the loft. He and his grandmother would stay until his parents came by on their way home. His father and mother always stopped at the Dargans and then, the four of them would ride home together, five now, with the baby.

10 His eyes burned from the glare of the water and from lack of sleep, but he continued to look for the slope. He felt a heightening of spirits then that the journey was nearing its end, and he allowed himself to whisper excitedly to Charlie, "We'll be there in a moment."

11 The dog had begun to pull at the bandage that bound his leg as if that were the cause of his pain. Dewey put down the oar, tied the bandage more securely, and said again, "We'll be there in just a moment." The words did not comfort the dog but they made Dewey feel better. He straightened and began to whistle.

12 With a start, his grandmother awoke. "How long did I sleep?" she asked anxiously.

13 "A couple of hours."

14 "Did you get along alright?"

15 "Yes, Grandma."

16 "I was afraid you might have run into some trouble."

17 "No, I did alright."

18 "Seems like we ought to be seeing the Dargans' place before long," she said. "I brought along my crocheting so Mrs Dargan could get me started on a new pattern." Already, she , too, pictured herself in the cabin, happily chatting with Mrs Dargan. "You know, it hasn't been a bad trip, boy," she said. She smoothed her skirt, then straightened her collar and bonnet.

19 "No, it hasn't," he agreed.

20 "Maybe you can bring me down the river again some time next Spring," she said. "We would come down, spend a night or two with the Dargans, and then go home."

21 "Yes, Grandma." Dewey did not spoil her plans by mentioning that the raft would not go back up the river. It was a thought that he, himself, did not like. At the Dargans, his raft would have to be abandoned, and he would never have those long happy hours at home with it.

22 " Isn't that Chimney Bluff, boy?" With her cane, she pointed ahead where a tall pile of rocks could be seen angled awkwardly against the blue sky.

23 "That's it," Dewey responded. He dipped his oar into the water, and then paddled in short, nervous strokes on the right side of the raft.

24 "Get ready to stop, boy."

CamScanner

25 "Yes, Grandma."

26 " Only wait till we get closer."

27 "Yes, Grandma."

28 "I'll tell you when to stop."

29 "Yes, Grandma."

30 He poled the raft closer to the shore. He could see wild black berries on the vine and a tiny green snake hanging over the water, its head lifted to watch their passing.

31 " Don't miss the bank, boy."

32 "I won't," he said loudly.

33 Although the raft was now out of the current and moving slowly, Dewey was still tense. His hands gripped the oar so tightly that his knuckles showed white beneath his tanned skin. He dipped the oar again into the water, nervously marking time. His mud-stiffened pair of trousers scratched against his legs.

34 He was so close to the bank that he could not see the cabin at all, but when his grandmother said, "Now, boy," without hesitating, he thrust the raft into shore and grabbed the weeds on the bank with his free hand. They bumped against the bank and stopped.

35 Dewey leaned weakly on his oar for a moment, and then said, "I'll take her down to the stump." Slowly, he let the raft glide a few yards and secured it with a rope. "We're here," he said.

36 His grandmother stood up and looked at the weed-covered bank. "Can't you take us to where it isn't so steep, boy?"

37 "You wait here, Grandma. I'll go up and get Mr Dargan."

38 "Yes," she agreed eagerly. "Tell Mr Dargan to come here and help me up the bank. Now, don't fiddle around, boy. Get him straight away."

39 "Yes, Grandma."

40 "Don't stop to play or anything."

41 "I won't, Grandma," he said impatiently.

CamScanner

42 He scrambled up the bank with his hands clutching the long weeds for support. At the top, he stopped to look down at his grandmother sitting erect in her chair. As he paused, he saw her reach into her satchel and take out her gold-rimmed spectacles.

43 These were her most prized possessions. She often said she was the only woman west of the Mississippi who had gold-rimmed spectacles. Then she put them on, carefully hooking them behind each ear. She glanced up at Dewey through the small glass circles, and he said quickly, "I'm going right now."

44 The wind, warm and gentle, blew against him as he ran towards the low trees that surrounded the Dargans' cabin. His hair tossed in the wind, and he ran gaily, happy that the journey was over and that he and the Rosey B had stood up to it.

45 Behind him, the dog limped on three legs, straining to keep up. It was unbearable for him to have to run behind the boy, when he had always been the leader, first up the path, first in the cabin, first to see what was over the hill. He barked his displeasure once, but Dewey did not wait for him. His bare feet flashed in the grass, and a chicken scuttled out of his way.

46 "Mr Dargan! Mr Dargan!" he called.

47 As he came closer to the trees, he began to run more slowly. Then he walked. Then he stood perfectly still, not even aware of the grass blowing against his legs, for suddenly he had the feeling that something was terribly wrong. It was such a strong feeling that he wanted to turn and run back to the raft without going to the cabin at all.

48 There was an unnatural stillness beyond the trees. No one answered his call. No smoke curled up from the chimney, yet there was the smell of it in the air.

49 Slowly, Dewey walked to the trees. His throat was so dry that he could not swallow. After pushing through the low branches, what he saw in the clearing ahead made him close his eyes.

50 There, before him, lay the blackened ruin of the cabin. The logs, once sturdy and straight, were now charred and fallen, and the ashes had been scattered by the wind so much that the earth, too, was black. Only the chimney, still high and strong was left to show that what had been there was a cabin.

51 Dewey walked forward. He stepped to where the entrance had been. The hinges that Mr Dargan had brought from their old home in Virginia were there, still hanging from a log.

52 Dewey knelt as if in prayer and felt the log. He remembered Mr Dargan fashioning the log into a door frame. He had admired the door frame. He turned it gingerly, thinking that it might still be hot, then felt it again. Beneath, there was still a faint warmth. The cabin had been burnt about the previous two days, he guessed. He suddenly felt cold with fear as he thought about his father and mother. If they had stayed here an extra day, only one extra day, they would have been trapped with the Dargans.

CamScanner

53 He rose slowly as he surveyed the whole of the ruins, looking with dread for some sign of his parents. His shoulders suddenly felt heavy and tired as if he were carrying an unbearable burden. The barn was gone, burnt like the cabin, and the horses, the fine mustangs, were nowhere to be seen. There was nothing but charred wood and ashes.
